

Preventing sexual abuse

Sexual abuse prevention

It is estimated that one in four girls, and one in seven boys, will be victims of sexual abuse before reaching adulthood. Sexual abuse occurs in all social, ethnic, and economic groups, and to children of all ages.

Sexual abuse isn't about sex or desire, it is about abuse of power – both of physical strength and authority. Sexual abuse relies on secrecy, so it is important that your child be able to talk to you about their bodies and their feelings.

Though most parents teach their children about “stranger danger,” it is important to note that the offender in sexual abuse cases is more likely to be someone well known to the parent or child.

What parents can do

- ♥ Parents need to trust their instincts about other adults or children who may appear threatening or just too interested in their child.
- ♥ Keep the lines of communication open with your child. Talk to your children every day and listen to their problems and concerns.
- ♥ Make sure that your child knows the difference between good and bad secrets.
- ♥ Encourage your child to trust his or her intuition. Intuition will alert a child when someone has touched them inappropriately.

- ♥ Parents need to pay attention to their child's change in behavior toward an adult or child. There might be something going on and your child may be in danger.

- ♥ Learn everything you can about age-appropriate sexual development. All children are curious about their bodies and parents should teach them about appropriate boundaries of behavior.
- ♥ Educate your children about the “uh-oh” touch. This is when a child is touched in such a way that leaves a feeling of “uh-oh, this isn't right.”
- ♥ Be cautious about any adult who has unsupervised access to your child.
- ♥ Let your child know that he has the right to say no to any unwanted touch, even if that means refusing to hug or kiss a friend or relative when asked. The choice should be his.
